

Excited Delirium and In-Custody Deaths

It's 2 a.m. and 42 degrees out. You get the call over the radio: naked man running down the street. You chuckle to yourself and take the call. Unfortunately, it's no laughing matter. This is one of the classic warning signs of a call that involves a person in a state of excited delirium. He is a potentially dead prisoner, and really dangerous to the responding officer as well. What you're faced with is one of the most volatile, life-threatening calls in law enforcement today, one that could change your whole career. Law enforcement officers must learn to deal safely and effectively with people in a state of excited delirium. This course will give you the tools to save yourself, protect the suspect and save your department from the liability associated with an in-custody death.

Topics covered:

- Introduction to excited delirium
- Recognition of symptoms
- De-brief and review of excited delirium incidents
- Winning tactics against people who appear to possess super-human strength
- Positional restraint asphyxia: fact or fiction?
- Documentation of incidents
- In-custody death investigation
- Use of the Taser in excited delirium cases
- Use of the hobble restraint, an alternative to the dangerous "hog-tie" method
- Take-down techniques
